Biography

Meredith Fort, PhD, MPH is a Research Assistant Professor in the Colorado School of Public Health in the Department of Health Systems, Management and Policy and the Centers for American Indian and Alaska Native Health. She has more than twenty years of experience working with public health and health care programs in low-resource settings in the United States, Central America and Mexico. Her research and public health practice focuses on co-creating, testing, and evaluating public health and community interventions that aim to prevent and control chronic disease and promote health equity. She is committed to participatory processes that engage patients, family and community members, providers, and system-level actors.
